I know people mean well, but most of these people do jobs they really like and seem to talk about. I work for an insurance company. It's a very boring job. Nothing to brag about, no funny otr good stories to tell. Anyway, he'll pay the bills. So I think my question is if you either hate the job or are bored with it, and if someone asks: What job?, what do you say to them without sounding rude, negative or depressed, or giving TMI? 02-22-2012, 02:25 16,384 posts, read 19,292,136 times Reputation: 14278 Say this: This is going well. How's your job going? 02-22-2012, 02:25 831 posts, read 2,536,124 times Reputation: 723 Same here. My job is meaningless, the whole dead end shit job. I feel like a loser, thank God no one asks me about my job, or I'd be even angrier. 02-22-2012, 2:59 PM 17,804 posts, read 22,197,639 times Reputation: 36125 Quote: Originally Posted by sware2cod Says this: It's going well. He pays the bills, you know. How's the job going? Person Great, I just got a raise, a corner office and a brand new company car! Are you: Are you the admissions? Can you say a few good words for me? Lol. See, problem solved. 02-22-2012, 4:57 Place: Southern California has 3,115 posts, read 7,587,587 times Reputation: 3677 They're just asking as a way to get you talking about how you are. So if you don't want to talk about work, just tell me the job's okay, but you know what? I just joined a softball team, and I'm really looking forward to it. If someone asks you a specific question about your work that is different, but if it's just a general How does that work? 02-22-2012, 05:12 PM 3,279 posts, read 7,006,011 times Reputation: 8308 I reply to this work. 5:21 15,478 posts, read 21,135,130 times Reputation: 22347 I know you didn't ask for this - but why is your job so boring and what you're doing to change change Forty-three years ago, I got a job that encodes oil-based grades. It's a boring job. The truck drivers describe the initial tank level (before you drain any oil from the tank) and the closing tank level. My job was to extract the closing number from the beginning and type that number into a form. All day. 40 hours a week. But I made the job as interesting as I could. I've read about how oil wells work, and everything else I've found in the oilfield industry. In those days there were no desktop computers or laptops and reading up meant going to the library. I taught myself so much about the oilfield business that I was soon able to get into office accounting - still boring but better paying and a chance to learn something else. I stayed in the office late at night, and with my boss's permission, I read the files on legal issues and other oil-related matters. Shortly thereafter, I moved to the legal field as a district order analyst, where I spent 42 wonderful years (several companies). This job is suitable for my talent and needs it perfectly (not to mention how big the salary is) and I'm actually saying I was almost sad to retire last year. But if I were the type to just sit on that running ticket coding job and complain about how boring my job is, Maybe I would have spent the next 42 years doing that. My work should at least be interesting for people who don't work third shifts with psychotic people. I glaze over when someone in a more boring environment wants to entertain their stories. Hey, I've been home for at least two weeks with whiplash because some crazy woman threw herself at me, how's your office job going? I can't stand the speech at work. My friend, who makes international health and environmental films, doesn't want to talk about work. And that's not the most interesting thing about it. Actually, I've been thinking a lot lately about _____ (spend ded-in on something you're thinking about. Hey, it's a life. Read any good books these days? As my dear father said, that's why it's called work. If it was fun, they'd call it fun. Maybe people are just asking you to ask for me back, and they can start bragging about something. He had a co-worker who, while divorcing, was hitting up on dating websites (for the first time in his life). He used to say, So, what's your love life like? I said it's pretty much the same since you last asked. (I wanted to ask him so he could say all the wonderful around he does- it was gross). I think about most things a lot more than I think about that. that way. I'm enjoying my current back injury as I can't go to work. When I worked as a tech writer (two of the longest years of my life) I'd numb my boredom and depression for lunch. If someone wanted to talk and asked, So, what are you working on? I can barely remember if it was the MC-3200 on the Sun platform or the 6400 or whatever and I don't know what the hell it did or why I should care, except I was being paid. I hated being asked that question. 02-23-2012, 06:33 AM 25,953 posts, read 27,975,007 times Reputation: 26770 Finally, if you're looking for a long-term relationship or marriage everything should come out anyway. People are naturally curious, and just thank your lucky star for sitting there with a woman who wasn't just talking about herself. They simply say it's boring to talk and give him a quick overview of some of the tasks you do, or one day in life, even a funny story. If I was with a guy who shuts up when a question like that comes up, I wonder what they're hiding. It's a true story. My best friend met this guy through a match-raiser. I went out to dinner with them, and when I asked him what he did for a living, he kicked me in the tibia under the table. We went back to his house and I had to use the bathroom and in the handkerchief of the toilet tank there was a huge bag of pills of different colors... He was a drug dealer. I was angry because if you wanted to put your head in the sand, don't drag me down with you, if the police came, I would have ended up in jail. I'm going to give him two extra points for stupidity, which he didn't have some work to discuss as a cover. 02-23-2012, 05:10 150 comments, read 2,518,794 times Reputation: 3,577 see the How is work? question as another way to say: How are you? I agree, I really don't want to know how to work more than people really want to hear about sinus congestion when they ask how it is. It's just an accepted polite greeting. Worse than that, when you introduce someone to a party and run out of things to say and ask what to do.. You feel obligated to say something interesting to continue the conversation. In your case you could say: I'm in the insurance business, what about you?, and quickly talk about their work and don't ask anything further in fear, you can try to sell them insurance. 02-23-2012, PM Place: where people are either too stupid to let or too stuck to move 3,025,831 times Fame: 3660 hate to be too, but that's because I'm unemployed.. I work at Amazon's warehouse; picking customers items, 10 hour shifts, walking 12 miles per day. Honestly, I was at this company because of the benefits and the school program exception. When people ask: How's work? I'm just telling them it's really good. Thanks. They don't really care if I'm miserable. You don't need to know exactly. If you don't feel satisfied with your work, try your best to improve yourself and finding something you're really passionate about. I suggest you read: Where will you be away in 5 years? Marty drank more than usual. Dave got busted for smuggling last month, we may never see him again. Paula won the Best HR Stripper Award last month and is now going to the finals. Linda's 17-year-old daughter just gave birth to twins, and half the office is getting nervous, waiting for the shipment of meth to arrive. I had a co-worker ask me that question, how did I feel at work/ how long am I going to stay on etc. Fortunately, I responded in a PC way. Later, I figured out how he was going to talk to the boss about everyone. If someone asks you how? just keep pc. Never talk negatively about work to anyone who works there. If you need ventilation do it here or talk out with a family member or close friend. 04-17-2016, 12:21 Pm Location: Tennessee 28,316 posts, read 21,228,906 times Reputation: 34727 It's just small talk.
